The Surrealist movement was founded in Paris in 1924 by the poet André Breton, who wrote the Surrealist Manifesto. Breton argued that Surrealism was a way of "liberating the mind from the straitjacket of reason" and that it could be used to create art that was "more real than reality itself."

Surrealism quickly spread throughout Europe and the United States, and it influenced a wide range of artistic disciplines, including painting, sculpture, photography, and film. Some of the most famous Surrealist artists include Salvador Dalí, René Magritte, and Man Ray.

Techniques of Surrealism Art

Surrealist artists used a variety of techniques to create their art, including:

* Collage: Surrealists often used collage to create unexpected juxtapositions of images and objects. * Photomontage: Photomontage is a technique that involves combining multiple photographs to create a new image. Surrealists used photomontage to create dreamlike and disorienting images. * Automatic drawing: Automatic drawing is a technique that involves drawing without conscious control. Surrealists used automatic drawing to explore the subconscious mind and to create images that were free from the constraints of reason. * Dream imagery: Surrealists often incorporated dream imagery into their art.
